The UCM first encountered the Pungari as part of a Shaltari force during Phase 2 of the Reconquest. Unlike their masters, they were prolific in numbers. In them, the Shaltari found a subservient race to exploit in much the same way they had planned for humanity.

Sightings of Pungari ships were reported shortly afterwards—not all had fallen in with the Shaltari. Apparently, the Pungari are new to starfaring; their blocky ships are primitive yet robust. Instead of the low-crew, high-firepower approach advanced generators afford to other races, the Pungari leverage sheer numbers. Routinely, they hurl thousands into suicidal boarding actions; something Pungari do willingly and—as far as UCM soldiers can tell—with much glee. Their stocky frames may cope with the extreme g-forces involved, unencumbered by too much brain to damage.

When encountering Pungari it is always a coin toss on whether they attack or not. They may try to broker simple alliances, happy to plunge into the wars of other races without expecting much in return, beyond a master to serve in awe.

Acquired Fighters & Bombers

This ship's Fighters & Bombers use the stats of its parent fleet (if you included this ship in a Scourge fleet, its Fighters & Bombers would follow the Scourge Fighters & Bombers rules).

Only ship of the class: Hyperyacht Aurorum

Hyperyacht Aurorum, launched 2493, was commissioned by Caesar Dun, boss of the East Eden Syndicate. She was uniquely built to impeccable standards, riddled with unregistered spaces, and armed far beyond EAA-sanctioned levels. While using her peerless stealth capabilities to evade justice, he unwittingly dodged the Scourge invasion. After months of shadowing a survivor flotilla, Caesar was garrotted by his lieutenant, who took Aurorum to join the refugees.

Today, Aurorum serves as the flagship of Karl Stieglitz, head of the galaxy's most infamous mercenaries: The Decapitators. This privateer flotilla earned dark renown during the Battle of Earth in the vanguard of the Vega Scrapfleet but is now a gun for hire. Stieglitz has already been approached by Kalium and, it is rumoured, the PHR. The UCM has yet to decide how to respond.

If this ship is destroyed with an Admiral assigned to it, you may transfer that Admiral to another friendly ship of H or C Tonnage with no Admiral within 18", losing the benefits of this ship's Command Ship rule.

Remnant

This Ship may be used in UCM, PHR, or Resistance fleets.

Recorded ships of the class: -River Queen, Twilight Spectre, Eclipse (UCM), Domus Aurea, Samuda, AAA (PHR), Kabal's Raiment [né Versailles], Kabal's Insight [né Midas] (Kalium), Bruised Beautiful [né Atlantique], Daughter of Eden (Vega Scrapfleet), Gilded Trident, In Diamond Clad (Independents)

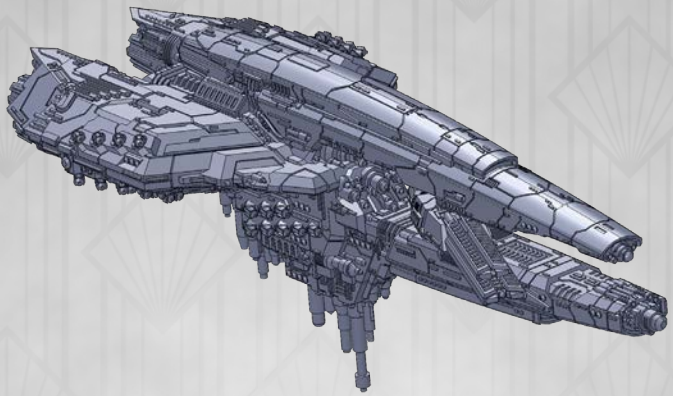

Pre-war System Admirals had unconscionable budgets and could procure ships for their battlefleet with little oversight from Earth. When it came to their personal ship, this created the conditions for a strange offering from the naval yards: opulence. Trident Industrial met this need lavishly with the Palatine Class Command Barge. An unusual ship of battlecruiser tonnage, it shares the typical style on the outside, but inside, no expense was spared. Marble, ebony and craftsmanship are terms you don't hear in military circles. Indeed, a single Palatine cost more than three Grand Battleships to build. The class features twelve overlarge lifeboats of unique design, the Magellan, each closer to an armoured yacht than an escape craft. Even the ship's guns use expensive, low-observable shells to reduce the ship's signature in combat. To offset this fabulous cost, Trident Industrial offered vessels to the private sector; owners included planetary governors, corporate titans and infamous syndicate heads.

Though rare, a high proportion survived the Scourge invasion and the hard centuries that followed due to quality, their excessive point defences, and the fact that owners weren't generally the sorts to go down fighting. Since everything on the Palatine was overbuilt to the highest standards, survivors are still prized, capable ships. Their bygone splendour and the hand-ground perfection of their optics even make them worthwhile to the Republic's Grand Fleet, which operates several, mostly the former property of prophesy-spooked CEOs. Kalium possesses two which the UCM is aware of, although apparently their more opulent spaces have been painted grey—they're still Shangrilanian inlay underneath. The UCM has five on their lists, including River Queen, which is reserved for Presidential use. Such ships could be built today, but the cost would make no military sense—it never did.

RESIN

This ship counts as a Rio Cruiser.

Famous ships of the class: Soldier of Fortune II, Trajan, Thunderchild

Due to the huge, ongoing losses of the Battle for Earth and the record military spending authorised by the High Council, it is a time of opportunity for all whose business is killing. The Titania Aerospace Corporation has been the biggest winner, to the point where they have spawned a new subsidiary: Titania Fleet Systems. While the company's home colony is justly famous for its cavernous, subterranean armour works, its orbital yards are tiny compared to Niccolum's. TFS is aiming to change that, starting with an entirely re-designed line of cruisers.

Matching the classic Rio class cruiser in performance, the new Titania pattern New Rio (named after New Rio on Titania) requires 30% less crew and 25% less core power, while offering improved crew comforts and endurance. As a result, TFS claim that their vessels offer 35% longer tours of duty than older classes. Only into its first year of production, the Admiralty has been slow to adopt these superior ships due to lack of spares and minimal standardisation with older classes - TFS's only concession to backwards-compatibility was the turrets. As the war grinds on and losses mount, TFS may see more desperate orders and eventually win over top-brass conservatives through combat.

New Berlin

Cruiser

RESIN

Counts As

This ship counts as a Berlin Cruiser.

Famous ships of the class: Borealis, Schadenfreude, Ardent II

One issue with the classic Berlin class cruiser has always been the constant refits. The interchangeable, modular nature of traditional colonial shipbuilding left the classes' primary laser weapon exposed, protruding from the hull. This makes heat dissipation challenging, leading to extreme local operating temperatures and frequent failures. Titania Fleet System's new design (named after the city of New Berlin) incorporates the laser into the superstructure, allowing heat to be channelled into the vast mass of the hull for eventual radiation into space. Effectively using the entire ship as a heat-sync allows 150% longer intervals between refits.

In combat performance, the Titania New Berlin matches the older pattern while requiring less crew, less energy and less maintenance. Despite this, TFS's yards are small, incomplete and incomparable to the vast conurbations orbiting the gas giant Niccolum. Also, the corporation has to compete with over a century's entrenched shipbuilding ethos, and Titania Berlin will likely remain a rare but welcome sight on the frontlines for some time...

RESIN

Kalium KNC-5

This Ship counts as a Resistance Light Cruiser with one NC-16 Missile Bank and two Vent Cannon Turrets.

Recorded ships of the class: Heartbleeder, Souleater, Rend II

Generally, Kalium's ruling Kabal prefers to replicate proven pre-war designs than to innovate, with a focus on numbers. However, after Kalium's first major blooding in the opening stages of the Battle for Earth, deficiencies became apparent. Visitors to UCM vessels brought back memories (and hushed whispers) that their ships might not be as advanced as their Kabal proclaimed. While combat performance was solid, helped by the iron discipline of their career-sailors, the lack of modern 'dressings' in crew areas verged on embarrassing. Clunky 2D viewscreens, general lack of lighting and spartan comforts were more visible than inefficient drives and un-optimised construction.

Kaluim's latest vessels, while essentially the same underneath, have a more modern, distinct appearance as well as countless internal refinements. Kalium still does not favour colourful class names, though. A 'KNC-5' (Kalium Navy Cruiser, Type 5) is one of their most common, new line cruisers, armed with a pair of vent cannon turrets and a potent close action missile array.

RESIN

Kalium KNC–12

This Ship counts as a Resistance Light Cruiser with one Vent Cannon Turret and two Fighters & Bombers.

Recorded ships of the class: Beton Brut, Chaimberlain Powelbon, Du Hast

Kalium's newest vessels' unique aesthetic suggests a deliberate attempt by the Kabal to 'brand' their forces, or at least to make them distinct from the old, tired ships of Resistance fleets. Certainly, the brutalist design speaks of utility, strength and a total distain for beauty - not that the UCM cares much for those either, but at least they don't seem to revel in them. The KNC-12 Fleet Carrier is one of the more common, offering excellent, cost-efficient utility to any admiral by way of a potent (if unsafe) vent cannon turret and a double set of launch bays. Unlike the Shaltari, Kalium has no shortage of pilots.

The increasing percentage of these newest vessels in recent engagements speaks of the extreme speed at which the Kabal can build ships - helped, no doubt, by the multitudes under the whip of penal servitude. Their manufacturing capacity is also fearsome, as scattered reports of the class operating under the flag of several Resistance fleets now exist, suggesting that Kalium's resupply arrangements, as the only manufacturer of old military hardware, have expanded greatly in recent months.

Centurion

Grand Cruiser

EXCLUSIVE

Remnant

This Ship counts as a Resistance Centurion Heavy Cruiser but may be used in UCM or PHR fleets in addition to Resistance fleets. In UCM and PHR fleets, they follow the same rules as the Resistance Centurion but gain the Rare special rule.

Recorded ships of the class: Pilum, Fontaine's Miracle, Myriad (Independents),

Proudcore, Industry, Fist of Iron (Kalium)

The Centurion was the most common standardised vessel of cruiser tonnage in the pre-war EAA Terran Grand Fleet. In those days the definition of Cruiser was somewhat broader; today, such a bulky vessel is designated as a Grand Cruiser, a classification not really in use with the UCMF. In bulk (though not in firepower), it is more akin to a modern Heavy Cruiser. It has truly excellent ceramic armour plating that outclasses all but defence monitors in the modern UCMF. The Centurion also features many of the typical advantages and disadvantages of vintage naval architecture. Originally manufactured by Trident Industrial over Olympus Prime, the design was soon licensed to Earth-based Equatorial Yards Inc. Only the licensed Earth pattern is still built today, by Kalium, though it also operates legacy Olympus Centurions.

Its simple but effective all-gun primary armament provides an excellent blend of destructive power and reliability. The class requires low weapon maintenance - a welcome factor that certainly isn't the case with some of the more esoteric and experimental armaments in mankind's pre-war arsenal.

Its primary armament is broadsides of transition mass drivers, alongside an oversized twin pure mass driver turret, more in keeping with modern UCMF gunnery, albeit with much heavier projectiles.

Vicarius

Battlecruiser

EXCLUSIVE

Counts As

This Ship counts as a Resistance Senator Battlecruiser.

Recorded ships of the class: Vicarius (Independent), Warcrimes, Grim Enforcer, Exterminator (Kalium)

While the Senator class battlecruiser was an abhorrent and unsanctioned creation of certain paranoid admirals, EAAS Vicarius was downright infamous. She was once the sole example of her class and, it is now understood, instrumental in the Cleansing of Wolfrum. In 2495, twelve years before the Scourge invasion, the mining colony of Wolfrum rebelled, violently. Soon, an unknown vessel of battlecruiser tonnage appeared above the capital and unleashed a spread of VX gas bombardment munitions, slaughtering the entire population.

No comment was made by the military and the government vehemently denied involvement. Senior individuals were executed in the following years, and often for crimes that should have warranted prison sentences. EAAS Vicarius next appeared as a loner in 2674, her decks cold with a sparse skeleton crew. Her senior officers had apparently boarded another human vessel and had not returned. Now, in 2679, new examples of her class have been spotted among Kalium's sinister vanguard fleets.

Styx

Battlecruiser

EXCLUSIVE

Counts As

This ship counts as a Stature Battlecruiser.

Recorded ships of the class: Styx

Although all Bioficer sightings are rare, if increasing, certain ship classes have only been observed once. The sole record of the fearsome Styx class comes from the mangled tertiary flight recorder of the battleship UCMS Bellaque. She was lost with all hands in the Eden system, and only an atomic cloud and cored-out hull fragments remained—the work of the fearsome Decon Annihilator, the Skyx's colossal primary weapon.

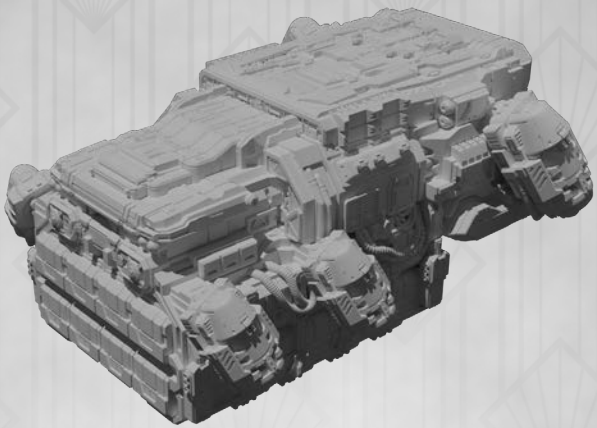

The Styx seems to have similar capabilities to the Statute class, but utilises an enlarged, novel hull more closely related to Bioficer cruisers. Some believe this vessel was unique, casting further doubt on the old notion that the Bioficers lack individuality. This ship may have been commissioned by a characteristic intelligence. Behaviour suggests individual pleasures, whims, and particular cruelties—a worrying confirmation of this race's apparent personal delight in violence and other's suffering.

EX-95 Strongbox

Civilian Hauler

AGENTS EXCLUSIVE

Counts As

This Ship counts as a Civilian M-Type Barge.

Recorded ships of the class:

When Eden Void Logistics inevitably collapsed, their lucrative fleet replenishment contracts were swiftly devoured by Karudo-Bauer. Infamous for a brutally simplistic approach to low-cost efficiency, best exemplified by their bare bones T-type Tugboat, VX-22 Flenser, and EX-7 Packet-Runner, the corporate giant swallowed Eden Void's remnants into its own subsidiaries.

Initially, Karudo-Bauer's plan was strictly bottom-line: retrofit the hull of the EX-7 Packet Runner, a budget, mass-haul courier, to replace Eden Void's aging, often faulty resupply ships. However, their engineers quickly recognized the catastrophic single-point-of-failure inherent in the old designs. It wouldn't be enough to simply refit the EX-7, an entire new spacefeame would be needed with updated mission parameters.

They didn't just need another disposable freighter, they needed an armoured workhorse.

The result was the EX-95 Strongbox.

Engineered to drag logistics kicking and screaming into high-intensity warfare, the Strongbox is no longer just a resupply ship. It is a battlefield anchor, a lifeline that refuses to break, and the reason front-line fleets rarely run dry. Where the old, flawed designs faltered, the Strongbox dominates.

System Details & Upgrades:

Segmented Cargo: Gone is the fatal flaw of single-point deployment of the SLM-9. The Strongbox unleashes its cargo in Compartmentalized waves, with each modular cargo chassis operating independently. Even under heavy fire, supplies keep flowing. If one section takes a direct hit, the rest of the array compensates instantly.

Tri-Core Redundancy Systems: With the Strongbox, no failure is final. Hydraulic systems, electromagnetic rails, and hardened manual overrides overlap in layers of reliability.

Siege-Grade Survivability: Unlike its fragile predecessors, this hauler doesn't need to cower in the backline. At the costs of aesthetics this flying brick is armoured and protected with its actuator housings and thick plating allow the vessel to operate in the bleeding center of active combat zones. Incoming fire is absorbed and endured, The mission continues, regardless of the crossfire.

This Ship is a reward for TTAgents.
